A Study Day on

Computer Assisted Language Learning for Research Purposes Applications for Algerian Master Doctorate Researchers

April 21st & 22nd, 2020

Rationale

Anecdotal discussions with colleague teachers and experience in supervision of research projects showed that despite the varied and sophisticated uses of computers for research purposes, many Algerian students limit their computer use to its basic functions such as word processing and data storage. Research in CALL has shown that if computers are used effectively, they could speed up the whole process of dissertation/thesis writing and improve the quality of the product. To name but a few functions, this electronic device could be used to access and locate data easily and quickly in databases, write up the bibliography, and facilitate the process of data analysis through the use of ready-made specialized software.

Consequently, the present study day focuses on the different computer-related technological applications such as databases, word processing, and statistical software that can help Master and Doctorate students gather, analyse and organise research data in an easy and efficient manner. Therefore, teacher-researchers are invited to share their experiences and skills of computer use for research purposes. It is, actually, assumed that the teachers' computer use for research purposes in particular and for academic writing in general must be a rich context to explore and communicate. It follows, then, that this pedagogical encounter is meant to gain knowledge from the teachers'/researchers' experiences in computer applications for research in the view of supplying teachers and students with invaluable opportunities to broaden their knowledge of the existing technological aids and to explore new computer-assisted practices.

The pedagogical event will extend over two days; the first day will be devoted for the teachers' presentations and discussions while the second day will be completely dedicated to practical issues in the form of workshops. Emphasis will be on the following sub-themes or tracks:

- Research data Collection.
- Data classification and organization.
- Data analysis and interpretation.
- Writing a well organized dissertation.
- Facilitating the application of the APA/MLA styles.
- checking and avoiding plagiarism.
- Applications for appropriate translation.

- Learning about methodology.
